Earlville War Hemp Mill

(By Kris Goodbred)

In 1942 during WWII, the Japanese gained occupancy of the Philippines and the West Indian Islands. This was significant as those two areas were the primary growers of hemp (marijuana) which was used to produce rope, cord and twine. In an effort to meet the demand for these products by the armed forces, the U.S. Government established the War Hemp program. There would be 42 mills built in the Midwest with 10-15 being located in Illinois. The program would be assigned to the Department of Agriculture and directed by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Edwin Packard Flickinger was already working for the government in the agricultural division when he was named manager of the Earlville Industrial War Hemp Mill. He lived with his family in Lanark, IL, and relocated to Earlville at that time. Construction of the mill began in August of 1942 on property south of town purchased from Mrs. Nora McGary. At the time, the road in front of that property was unpaved, and it seemed as though the mill was out in the middle of nowhere. That road eventually became the "new" Illinois Route 34. The cost of building the mills was approximately $350,000.

The crop would be planted by "drilling" the seeds into the soil. Farmers would be asked to join the war effort and sign a contract to plant hemp on at least 10 acres of their ground. Many were skeptical fearing that there would not be enough available labor, that the prices would be lower than a corn crop, and that their yields would be low because of their inexperience with this type of crop. The seed would cost $11/bushel, and the government would pay $30-50/ton depending on the quality of the crop. Crops would be harvested, cut, retted and bound - much of the work being done by hand. In some areas to the north German prisoners of war were brought in to provide labor at the mills.

The plants grew to between 10-12 feet tall. After the crop was harvested, the farmers had to burn off their fields. There were unconfirmed reports of bystanders feeling a little "giddy" following that process 😊

Production at the mill began in June of 1943. Eventually, 250 local farmers signed a contract to grow hemp for the Earlville mill. The first growing season was in 1943. The mill operated 24 hours a day running two 12-hour shifts. There was a cafeteria within the plant where employees could eat their meals. Peak employment was 135, and the workforce was made up of primarily women since most of the men were fighting the war. Laverle and Bruce Carter both worked at the mill. Laverle remembers riding to work on that dirt road in a Model A Coupe. Her job was called "hackling" where they combed and tied the fibers to get them ready to be loaded up and taken to the train cars. Peg Carter and Rosie (Hughes) Hanley served as secretaries. The office still stands and has been converted into a residence. Portions of the mill itself are still standing and used for storage.

Earlville proved to have the some of the most fertile soil providing high yields. The average returns for hemp were between $110-$115/acre. Maynard Martin had the highest yield (4.4 ton/acre) with a net return of over $200/acre.

A total of 143 train carloads of fiber were shipped out of Earlville to Belgium as well as every port in the world via the U.S. Navy and Army. Earlville produced more fiber than any other mill, and was one out of only 17 mills that produced TWO crops of hemp before closing.

As the war came to a close the importation of hemp products was restored. On the day that they received word that the war was over, the mill was temporarily shut down so that all of the employees could get into their trucks and parade through town, honking their horns and celebrating.

All of the U.S. mills were eventually closed with Earlville closing in March of 1946. Mr. Flickinger was asked to remain in town and open an ag implement business. The mill was sold to Union Asbestos and Rubber Company of Chicago in August of 1946. In 1955, George Gavora purchased the building and moved his business (Maize Industries) to the property until it closed in 1965.

The Museum has many artifacts from the Earlville Industrial Hemp Mill thanks to Keith Flickinger (E.P Flickinger's son) who still resides in Earlville. These include the original drawing of the mill layout, flyers announcing the Open House on July 27, 1944, and numerous newspaper articles related to the building and opening of the mill, production data and eventual sale of the building and property.

Thanks to Keith Flickinger and Laverle Carter for their contributions to this article!!
